OF COURSE NOT.

LATER!
SO WHY SHOULD I HAVE TO PAY YOU THE TWO BUCKS?

MEANWHILE!
JUST WHAT ARE YOU GOING TO DO WITH ALL THAT CANDY?
CHERISH IT! A THING LIKE THIS IS THE HIGHLIGHT IN A GIRL'S LIFE!
WELL, YOU CAN CHERISH THE NOTES! BUT ABOUT THE CANDY ---IF YOU ATE IT ALL YOURSELF IT WOULD TAKE YOU A YEAR! THERE'S NO NEED FOR IT TO GO TO WASTE BY GETTING STALE, SO I EXPECT YOU TO GIVE MOST OF IT AWAY!

A LITTLE LATER!
HELLO, MICKEY! WHAT ARE YOU DOING WITH ALL THOSE BOXES OF CANDY!
PATSY GOT 'EM FROM A GANG OF GUYS, AND SHE GAVE THEM TO ME TO TAKE DOWN TO MY CLUBHOUSE!

THE LESSON

THE residents of 31 Vine Street in Mayville liked to think of themselves as a typical American family. Mr. Tucker was a good-natured, intelligent man and had a keen wit. He was the manager of the Mayville branch of the John Company, a New York firm that manufactured chemical products. Mrs. Tucker was an attractive woman, active in community affairs, but even more active running the household and bringing up the three children. The youngest of the three was Helen, who at six years required quite a bit of attention when she wasn't in kindergarten. Kenny was ten, and a young prototype of his father. He was independent in thought and action and had a twinkle in his eyes that made him "irresistible" to friends, relatives and teachers alike.

Sally Tucker was sixteen and a junior at Mayville High School. Sally was a tomboy! She had auburn hair which she wore pulled back, uncurled, in a pony tail, and grey eyes. Her willowy figure was barely noticeable as it was almost always covered by one of her father's shirts over dungarees, or a sweater and a skirt when she was "dressed up." Sally was popular with all the boys and girls in her crowd. The girls liked her sense of humor and her good spirits, the boys liked the way she talked baseball and football and found her lots of fun to have along in a crowd. Sally was generally described as a "good joe."

One evening at dinner Mr. Tucker informed them that he had invited a new employee at the plant for dinner the following night. His name was John Russell and he had been sent down to Mayville by the New York office for four months training.

Sally came home from school the next day, changed into her dungarees as was usual, grabbed an apple and breezed out.

Sally was home by five. She plopped herself down in the living room to read the funnies.

"Sally Tucker," her mother said, "don't you think it's about time you got dressed? They'll be here soon."

"Dressed? I'm dressed now. These are clothes."

"Not the kind you're going to wear tonight. You go right upstairs and put on a skirt or something a bit more suitable."

Sally went to her room and while she was changing, Mr. Tucker came home with John Russell. When Sally made her appearance she had put on a skirt, washed her face, combed her hair . . . but she conveniently had forgotten to change her sneakers.

John Russell was a surprise to all of them, particularly Sally. He was about 25 years old, medium height, nice looking and had a warm friendly smile that endeared him to the entire family. To Helen he was "Uncle John" immediately; Kenny was all questions about New York and big city life, and Sally wanted to know all about the Dodgers, the Yankees and the Giants. It was obvious he liked the Tuckers also, and when Mrs. Tucker invited him to Sunday dinner, he accepted.

The next day was a big one at school. Notices were circulated about tickets for the junior prom which was to be held in a few months. There was great excitement about who was going with whom and what the girls were going to wear, and some of the boys began extending invitations at once. On the way home that afternoon with Beth and Jane, two of her best friends, Sally was deep in thought adding up her prospective invites and subtracting those she would decline.

"Jack Kane asked me this afternoon. I told him I'd let him know tomorrow," Beth said. "He's nice . . . I'm going to accept."

"No problems on my part . . . Paul's my man," said Jane who was going steady with Paul Hanley, class president. "What's with you, silent one?" she turned to Sally.

"Oh, nothing . . . just thinking of all the fun ahead for us."

During the next few weeks, Sally grew more and more pensive and less and less like the Sally everyone knew. Although they didn't know it, Mr. and Mrs. Tucker were right when they guessed that Sally was realizing that she was getting a bit old to be a tomboy. During those weeks, John Russell was a frequent visitor. One evening, he and Sally were sitting alone on the front porch.

"Do you have a girl friend in the city?" Sally asked.

"Yes. Her name is Ann, and she's very pretty." John answered.

LET'S TALK ABOUT THE LIVELY BALL!
YOU TALK ABOUT THE LIVELY BALL! I'M GOING TO THE MOVIES!

"Are you going to marry her?"

"Well," John hesitated. "I haven't popped the question yet, but I hope to when I return."

"What's she like, Johnny?"

"Oh, she's about your height, with soft blonde hair, a cute figure and has a woman's way of making a man feel like a man. She's smart, too. Graduated college, and is secretary to some big wheel."

"I'd like to be like that," Sally sighed. "Pretty and feminine."

"But you are pretty, Sally. And what's this talk about being feminine? I thought you liked dungarees and baseball?"

"Yes, I do, but . . ." she sighed again. "Oh, I don't know. I'm all confused."

"Something's bothering you, and I want to know what. Maybe I can help."

"It's nothing."

"Come on, young lady . . . tell me. Aren't the boys asking you out these days?"

"Yes . . . no. Well, they always have. I've always been invited to all the parties and movies. I thought everyone liked me. But the junior prom is coming up in a few weeks, and all my girl friends have been invited by someone, except me. No one has asked me. What's wrong with me suddenly?"

"Nothing's wrong with you, Sally. You're still the same wonderful girl you always were, and I'm sure everyone still loves you. No one's angry at you?"

"No, I get invited to play baseball and to go to the movies with the gang. But no prom invitation. Tell me what's wrong?"

"Want it straight?"

"Of course."

"OK, here goes. Sally, a man wants a woman to be a good companion. If she likes baseball and is a lot of fun to be with, that's wonderful. He'll like having her around. It doesn't matter if she's pretty or feminine . . . she's a 'good joe.' But when it comes to dancing and romancing, when everyone wants to show off his date, a man doesn't care a hoot if a girl knows what a home run is, if she can smile prettily, laugh at his jokes and make him feel important with himself and with the other guys. Get what I mean?"

"Yes, I think so. But what can I do? I'm me."

"Stay yourself . . . during the day when you're playing ball. But comes the evening, touch yourself with a magic wand and like Cinderella turn into a princess. In other words, forget baseball and dungarees, the pony tail and sneakers. You're very pretty . . . show it. A few curls, a bit of lipstick and a pretty dress. See what happens."

"Thanks, Johnny. You're right, I know it. But in the meantime, what do I do about the prom? I do want to go."

"Yes, we've got to get you there, looking like a princess. Is there anyone you can ask? He doesn't necessarily have to go to Mayville High, does he?"

"No. But there's no one I can think of, unless . . ." Sally hesitated.

"Unless what?"

"Unless you'd go with me. That is, if you wouldn't mind, and if you don't think Ann would mind."

"Wouldn't I be a little old for your friends?"

"It wouldn't hurt if when I make my appearance as a princess, I do it on the arm of an 'older man'."

John laughed. "No, I guess it wouldn't. I'd be delighted, princess."

The few weeks until the prom were hectic for Sally and Mrs. Tucker . . . shopping for a dress, trying out new hair styles, experimenting with a little make-up. They chose a short formal of pale net and high heels dyed to match, and decided to let her hair fall loosely about her shoulders with just a bit of curl on the end. Looking at herself in the mirror the night of the dance, she hardly recognized herself, and as she came down the stairs, she knew by the look of approval in John's eyes and the look of pride in those of her parents that she was a success.

The first of her friends to notice the "new" Sally at the dance were Jane and Beth, who mumbled an awed hello to John and merely stared unbelievingly at Sally. Within a few minutes word had gone around the entire dance hall to "get a look at Sally Tucker," and at the end of the dance she was surrounded by old friends and new admirers. Comments like, "Sal, you look wonderful," or "Gee, that's a pretty dress," were heard from the female contingent. The boys came forth with "Where have you been all my life, doll?" and "The next dance is mine, beautiful."

As John swept her onto the dance floor with all eyes following them, Sally knew that after tonight she would never be the same Sally again. She knew that she had taken the first step forward from a girl to a young lady, and she had confident plans for a lot more steps in the same direction.
